Kandice’s story about the Hawaiian Menehune’s:

An old Hawaiian legend reveals the story of the Menehune, or Hawaiian elf. They are thought to be very small, from 3” to 12” tall, with pointed ears and stocky body. To keep from being seen they only come out at night, living under the ground in lava tubes or in holes dug into the earth during the day. The Hawaiian Goddess Ra’i Ra’i was chosen to watch over the little Menehune folk. Knowing that the Menehune’s love to play and make mischief, she urges them to do their work first. This is when they help people in need. It was such that rock walls and fishponds appeared miraculously overnight, without anyone seeing or hearing them at work. The only way anyone has known they were there, is that they leave their tiny footprints behind. Sometimes people have found mysterious little red marks on their skin, which some believe is where a mischievous Menehune has pinched them.
